5,605

copies, the largest paid circulation of any daily paper in this section.

Money also flew at the recent Boston aero meet, for now they haven't enough to pay the guarantors.

The "silence" protest of the West Point cadets is a sort of conversational boycott.

The gubernatorial candidates in New Hampshire are long on words, even if short on name. Both Bass and Carr are exercising their words freely.

Mayor Fitzgerald of Boston says he believes in having the office seek the man, rather than the man seek the office. Wonder when Fitz was converted to the idea.

One of these days the Kansas millionaire who was forced to cross the Atlantic in the steerage will just need to crank up his private aeroplane and glide over.

Dubuque, one of the largest cities in Iowa, gained only 6.1 per cent. in population during the last ten years. Many a town in Vermont will show as good a gain as that.

Three Middlebury college professors, returned from an exploring expedition in the northland, still maintain their reputation for veracity; so it seems that one need not lose his reputation by traveling in the unknown regions.

The Republicans are battling for the crumbe in Maine this year, and so small a thing as a town representative election is a bone of contention. Now the Republicans are claiming the town of Lamoine on a plurality of one vote. In years gone by, such a thing would scarcely have been thought worth while.

It is not to be wondered at that Mayor Gaynor of New York declines to try for more political honors before he has recovered from the evils which were associated with an official position of less prominence than the New York governorship. He is not yet a well man, and, furthermore, he deserves a respite from active political participation, because of the especially arduous work which he has been called upon to do in connection with the headship of the great metropolis. Mayor Gaynor is a home man and does not glory particularly in the glow of official preferment; and it would be a hardship just at this time to drag him out of the quiet and retirement which was forced on him.

REASONS FOR A CITY'S GROWTH.

In accounting for the great growth of Springfield, Mass., during the past decade, the Republican of that city gives the causes in the following: "A beautiful river location, good government, good schools, a community spirit favorable to tidiness and care for appearance in the keep of buildings and grounds, diversity of manufactures, a high grade of manufactures growing out of the presence of the army and its years of fostering a supply of highly skilled labor and location at the junction of great trunk lines of railroad running east and west and north and south."

Those certainly are powerful agencies toward the upbuilding of any place, and it must be admitted that Springfield has them in pronounced contrast to many other Massachusetts city that might be mentioned. Cities which are desirous of growing faster will, indeed, find the opportunity in those things which the contemporary has mentioned. On top of these reasons is the advantageous location of Springfield, as the contemporary suggests, midway between two large cities, Boston and New York, and far enough from the overshadowing influences of each so that the city is not dwarfed in development by the two giants. All those things play an important part in the wonderful growth of Springfield, which stands as an example for communities.

WINTER RESORTS IN NEW ENGLAND.

Efforts are being made to make Maine a "resort state" all the year around, the state board of trade having taken up the work. There is plenty to make Maine, New Hampshire or Vermont interesting through the Indian summer and fall months of the year; and to those who are willing to stand the rigor of the winter months there is also considerable to interest them in the way of outdoor life from December to March.

Certain sections of Vermont are already attracting people from the cities during the winter months, strange as that may seem to Vermonters. The nucleus for the attraction is a comfortable, cozy hotel, to which the sojourners can return with the assurance of having their wants attended to reasonably well. Most of Vermont's hotels are all-the-year-around hotels, and they should be in a position to cater to the city public in the winter, as well as in the summer. If our visitors show a disposition to come in winter, the hotel keepers will doubtless be in a position to receive them well. Then comes the value of the plan which is on foot in Maine, which plan is to so present the pleasures of a Maine winter as to make the people want to go to Maine in the cold months. Advertising through the state board of trade is the keynote of the program, to convince the residents of the cities that there is something in the winter life in Maine that they should have. It is a novel idea, indeed, to endeavor to draw people away from the conveniences of large city life into the country regions of New England. Very probably it will not appeal to a very large proportion of the vacationists, chiefly perhaps to those who are seeking health in the open life of country regions; but even at that Maine will gain something through getting such a proportion of people.

The Morgan Fair.

Whether by wise design or happy accident, the Vermont state fair has originated, in its annual show of Morgan horses, a feature that has given it already national interest and standing and will continue to do so in increasing measure.

To the writer, as we sat by the show ring and watched the judging of a splendid class of 25 Morgan stallions, a neighbor said: "I came 800 miles to see these horses. We have better draft horses in the West than you have in the East. We can go down to Kentucky and Tennessee and get all the speed we wish. But for an all around general purpose, every hour in the day and seven days in the week horse, we have got to come to New England and look for the best survivors of the real old Morgan type."

Our western friend came to the right place surely when he bought his ticket to White River Junction. There were 200 Morgans there the past week, from old Bob Morgan, sired as a colt at 20 years and a replica of the "before the war" Morgans to the new type, on larger, rangier lines, which Joseph Battell and others are developing. It was a great show of good horses; a potent drawing card and a valuable asset to fair and state.

We were pleased to note a number of New Hampshire names in the membership of the club under whose auspices this department of the fair is conducted, and we hope that another year there will be more. New Hampshire farms can raise and New Hampshire hills can toughen as good Morgans as Vermont's best. There is no reason why we should not share with our neighbors, to some extent, the benefits of this prospective boom in the horse market.—Concord, N. H., Monitor.

Jingles and Jest

When She Sings.

When you sing to me at twilight
'Neath the glimmer of the moon,
How my heart would thrill with rapture
As its sweet triumphant capture
If you were not out of tune!

When you warble tender ditties
How my pulse would pit-a-pat,
With a full responsive beating
Tins your songs of love repeating
If you did not sing so flat!

Truth is truth, my darling, always,
And it holds between us two;
It will even live and blossom—
I confess 'twill have to go some—
Out of time and out of key!

But indeed it is a pity
Discord haunts us fair a throat
And your gushing of emotion,
Which inspire my deep devotion,
Issue on so false a note!

The Giffie G'en.

"Had a most glorious experience to-day," said the tragic actor. "I saw a bioscope show of myself playing Hamlet. 'And what profession do you intend to adopt now?' asked his candid friend in a tone that had got him goaded throughout Europe.—London Globe.
